observations

Fear seen as major obstacle to gay rights

By Steve Cantrell

I feel a compelling urge to shed a little light on an issue that has been neglected by the media. I believe that there is an urgent need for society to confront the fear and ignorance surrounding gay rights. The media has failed to adequately report on this issue, and I feel that we need to take action to combat this ignorance.

The problem is not limited to a few isolated incidents. In many communities, newspapers and television stations have failed to report on the existence of gay rights issues. This is especially true in rural areas, where the media's reach is limited.

It is time for us to take action and demand that our voices be heard. We need to demand that the media report on this issue in a fair and accurate manner.

One must realize that homophobia occurs in both the likeliest and unlikeliest of situations.

The homophobes are called “coming out.” This refers to the process of acknowledging one’s sexual orientation to oneself and to others. However, the term is also used to describe the process of coming out to the gay community. This often involves a difficult and sometimes painful process.

The gay community is often seen as a haven for those who feel isolated and marginalized in their own communities. However, the reality is that this is not always the case. Many gay individuals face discrimination and prejudice in their daily lives.

In conclusion, I believe that we need to take action to combat the ignorance and fear surrounding gay rights. We need to demand that the media report on this issue in a fair and accurate manner. We need to demand that our voices be heard.

Steve Cantrell, A'T9, is a Fine Arts major, and a member of the Tulsa Gay Community.