Students fight for campus smoking-free RALLY

Students are less inclined to get involved even though this is something meaningful," said a student activist. "But if we can get it to the point where it's something that people really care about, it'll be easier to get people involved." Students have been holding meetings and organizing events to raise awareness about the issue of smoking on campus. The university has been responsive to these efforts, and has implemented some measures to address the problem. However, more action is needed to create a truly smoke-free campus.

Professor Howard Solomon, who identified himself as a Jewish community member, said, "We are all literally living in a smoke-filled society. The air quality is terrible. We have no right to continue to expose ourselves to this hazard."

"We need to work together to make our campus a safer and healthier place," said another student activist. "We need to stand up and demand that our campus be free from tobacco smoke."
